Governor Daniels backs trails

In a major boast for trails like the Pumpkinvine, Indiana Gov. Mitch Daniels has put the authority of his office behind the development of trails and greenways in Indiana.

Daniels hosted an Indiana Trails Plan Summit May 31 in Indianapolis at which he announced that the state would double funding for trails in the coming year from $10 to $20 million.

Daniels said that he saw “enormous potential and enormous interest in trails in Indiana.” He indicated that he wouldn’t be satisfied with a few token trails. “We have the potential to be a national leader” in trails, he said. Indiana is not good for skiing, but it is “perfect for riding bicycles,” Daniels said. “The terrain is flat and scenic.”

The governor linked access to trails to better health for individuals and for the economy of Indiana. Because Indiana is a more expensive state for health care, it’s a problem when he tries to convince businesses to move to the state.

In order to attract businesses, Indiana “must be the most livable space it can be.”

That’s where trails come in. Trails enhance the quality of life, and an enhanced quality of life attracts people with ideas. “People with ideas can be anywhere,” he said. “I want Indiana to be the best sandbox in the world.”

Thus trails will give us a competitive edge, he said. “When we achieve these [trails], we will have a healthier state,” physically and economically.

Daniels said the state government was fully committed to making Indiana a showplace for trails. Acknowledging that $20 million wasn’t nearly enough to do the job, he said his intention was “to jump start this thing.”

“I love planners. I love doers. It’s time to do,” he said.

The planning summit is the second major step the governor has take to promote trails. Earlier in the year he appointed Ray Irvin, former head of Indy Greenways, as director of Greenways & Bikeways for the Indiana Department of Transportation.

Three members of the Friends board attended the meeting: Larry Neff, Jim Smith and John Yoder.

“I was impressed with the fact that the governor didn’t really bother to debate the pros and cons of trails and greenways,” said Yoder. “He assumed they were good for communities and for Indiana. That’s a huge change in perspective from when we started working on the Pumpkinvine Nature Trail.”

Other summit speakers were Kyle Hupfer, director of the Indiana Department of Natural Resources, and Thomas Sharp, commissioner of the Indiana Department of Transportation. Both endorsed the state’s draft plan for trails, greenways and bikeways called “Hoosiers on the Move.” The plan proposes access to a trail within 15 minutes or 7.5 miles for all Indiana residents.

From the president

The Monon turns 10

“The Monon Turns 10” was the headline on the front page of the Indianapolis Star on June 25, 2006. In three pages of articles, the Star celebrates the 15.7-mile Monon Trails’s recreational and economic benefits.

One article traced the development of the Monon from “an abandoned strip of weeds” to “something Hoosiers show off to the out-of-town guests.” Former Indy Greenway head, Ray Irvin, was fond of pointing out that the greenway attracts 1.2 million visits a year—more than attend the games of the Indianapolis Colts, Pacers and Indians each year.

The Monon has always attracted bikers and joggers, but more recently has attracted high-end condos from savvy developers. The article titled, “Everyone wants to be on the Monon,” by Bill Ruthhart notes the change in attitude about living adjacent to the trail from when it was proposed to today. In the beginning, adjacent landowners feared a trail would reduce their property values; today “land values are soaring along the trail’s most popular span, from Broad Ripple to Carmel.” In that eight-mile area, 17 residential projects are built or are being planned near the Monon—approximately 2,000 new living units.

Retail businesses have also found the Monon a great location. In Broad Ripple, there are more than 35 restaurants and bars within a block of the trail. The trail boasts four bike shops where you can purchase or rent a bike.

The creativity of people along the trail has added variety and beauty to the greenway experience. Artists have painted two large murals around 16th Street near the south end of the trail. Pat Mack, a sculptor who lives along the trail near 52nd Street, has constructed a 17-foot Angel of Hope in his yard. Gary Cantrell, who lives at 104th Street has constructed a drinking fountain that looks like a fire hydrant.

It’s great to see the Monon receive this kind of recognition, but what’s its relevance for those of us who support the Pumpkinvine Nature Trail? Let me mention several connections.

- It’s a model greenway: Every time I ride on the Monon it inspires me to think about the possibilities for the Pumpkinvine. I see couples riding together, seniors enjoying nature and young families out for a walk. It has turned an eyesore into public space where people interact with each other socially. Its success is a powerful argument for us to persevere in developing the Pumpkinvine for similar uses.
- Attitudes change: Adjacent landowners initially opposed the Monon. Now people are clamoring to live beside the Monon. Recently I heard of residents in Shipshewana who are impatient for the trail to reach them. In 2002, the developer of the Amber Meadows subdivision along the Pumpkinvine placed an ad in The Truth that recommended his subdivision along the Pumpkinvine as “the perfect place to live.” I take it that he wasn’t anticipating a decrease in property values.

If you aren’t familiar with the Monon Trail in Indianapolis and Carmel, you should definitely visit it and be inspired.  PUMPKINVINE BIKE RIDE
JUNE 16, 2007
 (The third Saturday of June)

An unusual impression of the ride

By Danny Graber, Bike Ride chair

In the previous six years at the end of the ride, I focused on the things that went wrong and noted them for improvement next year. On this year's ride, something entirely different happened. The day was going to be so hot; I feared it would be too much for the riders and volunteers. Weariness and fatigue is all I could imagine as the heat, sun and lack of shade or breeze would inflict its toll.

But just before noon, as the earliest riders started to return, I began to notice not wobbly legs nor dispirited hearts, but cheery dispositions and enthusiasm for what they had just accomplished. My thoughts switched to, "Okay then, surely at the end of the day—when the longer-distance riders return things will change to my presupposed notion of dreary dispositions and weakened spirits."

My predictions couldn't have been further from the truth. It is true, we had a few more instances of roadside assistance this year and ferried in a few more bikers, but nothing out of the ordinary given the circumstances. Bikers and volunteers alike rose to the occasion, undaunted by the oven-like temperatures leaching away energy at every step and turn of the crank.

So, as tradition would have it at the end of the day, I focused on what was wrong. I realized it was just me. The resiliency, strength, and dispositions of bikers and volunteers should really be left to themselves, while I focus on keeping myself in line.

So next year I will make sure the food and ice-cold water and Gatorade are in place and leave the weather to itself and to you—the rider and volunteer—I'll offer kudos for spirit and resolve beyond my slightly misguided expectations.

Annual meeting: Achievements and goals

The Friends of the Pumpkinvine Nature Trail held its annual meeting April 25 at the Farmstead Inn and Conference Center, Shipshewana. More than 290 people attended.

Norm Kauffmann, special projects manager for the Town of Shipshewana, shared master plans for the park and city that included development of the Pumpkinvine Nature Trail. The trail will go into town from CR 850 W and including a spur to the new Visitor's Center and other businesses along SR 13. He used aerial views and photos to show the current condition of the corridor in LaGrange County.

John Yoder, Friends' president, listed achievements from the past year for the various phases of the project and emphasized that in each case the best is yet to come for the trail. Those achievements included:

- Phase four, Elkhart Co. Line to Shipshewana: The town of Shipshewana received $1 million to develop this section last year. It could be opened in 2007 or 2008.
- Phase five, CR 28 (Goshen) to SR 20 (Middlebury): The Friends negotiated five land agreements with adjacent landowners to settle the route of the trail. These exchanges that go around farm fields have the potential to add variety to trail.

- Phase six, US 20 to Wayne St.: The Friends purchased a gap in the corridor from Mary Heign. There's potential for three tunnels under US 20, CR 22 and CR 37.

Goals for 2006-07 include:

- Resolution of one law suit east of Middlebury
- Application for funding of phase 6, including one tunnel
- Application for funding of a section of phase 5, including two tunnels
- Finalizing agreements with five landowners
- Transfer land in phase 3 to Elkhart County Park Dept.
- Transfer land in phase 4 to the Town of Shipshewana

The 2007 annual meeting will be held on April 24 at the Greencroft Senior Center in Goshen.

Cathy Miller appointed to Friends board

By Buddy Dyck

The board of the Pumpkinvine Nature Trail, Inc. has appointed Cathy Miller to the board. A former high-school teacher, Cathy has a B.A. and a M.A. in library science and is currently media specialist at Lakeland School, LaGrange, Ind.

She and husband, Mike, reside in Middlebury, Ind.

As a board member of the Friends, Cathy hopes she can help make the 17-mile trail a reality in order to provide kids and grownups with the opportunity to reconnect with nature. She perceives the development of the Pumpkinvine Nature Trail as a genuine resource for Shipshewana, Middlebury and Goshen (and communities beyond), and her desire is that all users of the trail might enter into that invigorating setting where peace and beauty intertwine. Cathy anticipates the time when a fully developed trail will provide an option for cycling or walking, especially for those folks not disposed to travel on busy, narrow county roads.

In addition to serving as an outlet for children's health, Cathy also envisions the Pumpkinvine as an economic asset for this region, especially when community authorities begin advertising the trail as an exercise option for the many tourists that want to do more than shop antiques in northern Indiana. And she notes, "Property values increase where people have ready access to the walking and bicycling trails."

One priority as a board member of the Friends is to get kids moving and into nature. "Our children are overweight and many are out of touch with nature," she said. "The Pumpkinvine Nature Trail could be the incentive for schools to form bicycle clubs that would use a safe trail like the Pumpkinvine and thereby address both their obesity and inactivity. In addition, there are the Amish and an increasing number of Spanish immigrants—all are potential users of the Pumpkinvine. For all of these groups and tourists also, the Pumpkinvine Nature Trail would provide a fun and safe option for family and cross-cultural activity. I want to do my part in making this happen."
